Henry McCarty, more commonly known by his outlaw name, Billy the Kid, was an outlaw and a fugitive. He grew in infamy for his crimes and his ability to evade the law. He allegedly escaped from jail on multiple occasions and killed several men, including Lincoln County Sheriff, William Brady (History 2016). However, Billy the Kid is touted as both a hero and a villain because, while his crimes were vast and horrendous, they were thought by some to be justified.

Billy the Kid, also referred to as William H. Bonney, was born on September 17, 1859 in New York City (Brothers 2015). Shortly after McCarty's mother married William Henry Harrison Antrim, the family relocated to Silver City, New Mexico. After the passing of his mother, McCarty found work at a boardinghouse. After a year under this arrangement, he left and it was then that Billy the Kid began his criminal ways. He was arrested for stealing clothing and guns but escaped two days later.

After his first escape from prison, McCarty fled to Arizona Territory. In 1877, McCarty shot Francis "Windy" Cahill after a very heated argument (LeMay 2015). Cahill was known to speak in a demeaning manner to McCarty, and on this particular day, a fight ensued. In the midst of the brawl, McCarty and Cahill struggled for Cahill's gun when it went off in Cahill's direction. McCarty was again arrested for his crimes. He escaped imprisonment, stole a horse, and fled.

McCarty then found work with John Tunstall as a cowboy. Tunstall and the local lawyer, Alexander McSween, presented an opposition to the economic and political powerhouse held over Lincoln County by a trio of firearm-wielding businessmen. This began the Lincoln County War. McCarty joined the Lincoln County Regulators, a posse that banded together during the Lincoln County War to disband the trio of businessmen and avenge the murder of John Tunstall. The Regulators were indicted for the murder of Morris Bernstein, making them outlaws.

McCarty, or Billy the Kid, was finally caught and subsequently killed by Sheriff Pat Garrett (LeMay 2016), a man with a few stories of his own. Garrett found McCarty attempting to flee and shot him. Billy the Kid is legend known by many, but few actually know the true story. He is most often villainized for his heinous crimes and his ability to elude punishment for those crimes, but few who have studied and know his history consider him to be a hero in disguise.
